Unwanted Australians

Through examination of thousands of pages of previously classified government files over a period of five years, journalists Kristina Kukulja and Lindsey Arkley revealed that hundreds of migrants were denied citizenship and faced other negative consequences - including travel and employment restrictions, family and community divisions - up to the 1970s because of known or suspected left-wing political views.

These findings were brought together in a special multi-media, long-form adaption that included a contemporary interpretation of historical and surveillance images, and access to audio-visual and other elements in English and numerous other languages.
